Twenty-Seventh Infantry.

The organization of this regiment was commenced in the latter part of the year 1862. Recruiting proceeded so slowly at that time that on the 1st of February following, it was ordered to Ypsilanti, and consolidated with the Twenty-eighth, which was also at that time being attempted to be organized. Finally, after the consolidation, the regiment left the State on the 12th of April, and proceeded to Kentucky, having on its muster rolls 865 officers and men, though in reality a less number of men were present. It was stationed at various posts in Kentucky until the 9th Corps, to which it was attached, was sent to Mississippi, in June. It moved with the army in its advance upon Jackson, and after the evacuation of that place, and the reconnoissance to Pearl River, in which it participated, it went to Milldale, Miss., returning to Kentucky with the Ninth Corps, in the following month. In September it marched to Cumberland Gap, thence to Knoxville, where it bore a part in repelling the siege and assault on that place. It remained here till the Corps was transferred to the Army of the Potomac, with which it was connected during the campaign from Culpeper, in May, to the fall of Lee's army and the end of the war. The story of its latter campaigns would embrace the fiery trial of four months from the 17th of June, in the front line of works around Petersburg. It would tell of the deadly daily firing that never ceased for weeks together. Through all this the Twenty seventh did its duty well, and when the time came it took a front stand in the corps that charged and captured Fort "Hell" and its chain of defences.

The regiment reached here yesterday evening at half past five, and, with the two Wisconsin regiments noticed elsewhere, marched through the streets under their old brigade colors, led by Brevet Brigadier General Charles Waite, who, it will be recollected, went out as a 2nd Lieutenant. This is probably the last time—until the next war—that Detroit will see a full brigade of troops in her streets in heavy marching order.
